LEARNING OUTCOMES

- Knowledge of the most important movements and transnational actors and critical understanding of the main theoretical explanations on the origins and spread of transnational political processes
- Knowledge of the socio- economic profile of transnational activism and the relationship between the national social contexts and transnational activism.

DESCRIPTION OF CONTENTS: PROGRAMME

This course is meant to provide students with a general introduction to the problems and challenges inherent in the analytical framework of studying social movements and transnational actors. The answers to the question of why we should study social movements and collective action have changed over time. Moreover, the answers are also different, depending upon the theoretical frameworks through which the social scientists work, his /her/they gender, generation and practitioners¿ experiences. During this course we will draw upon a broad range of social perspectives located in contemporary struggles covering diverse social mobilizations based in different parts of the world. We will highlight differences and commonalities in selected fields of social justice struggles. A critical reading of new movements and transnational actors will be supported during this course by a range of literature produced by academics, political engaged actors and practitioners.

LEARNING ACTIVITIES AND METHODOLOGY

Seeking to reflect the theoretical, methodological and substantive diversity of the study of social movements, a broad range of articles and book chapters need to be read by throughout the course. Students are encouraged to critically reflect upon their experiences with social movements (if they have) and their own disciplinary specializations (such as law, economics, international studies, and political science) when studying the central concerns and arguments of each text. From time to time, reading materials will be complemented with contemporary videos and short media pieces. During lectures the main theoretical approaches and ongoing international debates regarding each particular topic will be presented and discussed. Seminars will be devoted to discuss readings, conduct debates and other participatory learning activities.

% end-of-term-examination: 60

% of continuous assessment (assignments, laboratory, practicals...): 40
