OBJECTIVES

This is a formative course that provides beginner students with a better understanding of legal concepts through their historical analysis within the framework of various and successive political models. Although they have their origin in the Western legal tradition, these concepts were reformulated by the Enlightenment and the Liberal Revolution and have acquired today (following the crisis of the liberal system and the triumph of the constitutional and democratic state) a wholly new meaning. Only by becoming aware of this historical density can the student understand and value the instruments that he/she will employ in a globalized and unstable legal order. Throughout this course, the student will learn about the evolution of the legal system, its institutions, and legal-political doctrine. This will allow him/her to discover the social value of law, acquire a critical sense of its evolution and develop his/her ability to synthesize information. In short, it will provide the student with interpretive elements that will allow him/her to take the lead in his/her professional future, and not be a mere data collector.

LEARNING ACTIVITIES AND METHODOLOGY

The course is divided into ten learning units which can be downloaded from Aula Global. The course is continuously assessed and is organised through lectures and seminars. In the lecture, the student receives an orientation on the content (fundamental concepts, problems) and work materials. In the seminars, once the personal work has been completed, the students, through working groups, comment on the readings related to the subject and discuss among themselves a series of questions on the content of the subject. Likewise, several individual essays are carried out throughout the course on the different topics to individually assess the student's work and how he/she relates the contents of the subject with the readings and historical texts that are uploaded in Aula Global. Finally, the student's attendance and participation in the continuous assessment will be computed and taken into account in the final grade of the course.
